Men can acquire knowledge and become knowledgeable, but to become a wise person, there is very little external support and substance. If knowledge flows from information, reading and serious study, wisdom is an innate gift of God that can neither be acquired nor borrowed. It is a common belief that at the feet of the wise, one can find answers to one's queries, but can not accomplish the inner strength that wisdom provides to the sage or the learned and the philosopher. Wisdom is a self-propelling property that none can steal from the wise one. It is an asset that comforts and consoles in the trying and tormenting moments of life. Both knowledge and wisdom are poles apart. The sources of knowledge can be found in various ways, but as far as wisdom is concerned, it is a guest that seldom reaches its end by wishing or watching. Knowledge is an acquisition that can command price in the market whereas wisdom is a flavor and fragrance that has enormous value but no price-tag.
